Out of 35 grants made in 2022...
Supporting small grassroots collectives and new initiatives and putting them on the map for other funders is one of our key contributions to the European social movement ecosystem. For 35 of our 59 grantees of 2022 we were among the first three institutional donors. Overall, we realise over and over again the importance of small grants, which is also why we intend to grow our Reflex budget in the coming years. Repeatedly, other foundations reach out to us asking whether we would be able to support organisations in their network with a small grant because they themselves cannot support these kinds of requests because the minimum grant amount is 20, 30 or even 50k. On the other hand, all of them find movement building and supporting grassroots collectives important. It seems there is a mismatch between the aspiration to support grassroots movements and the grantmaking practices and administrative capabilities of these funders.

If you want to support grassroots groups, you as a funder need to be prepared for going through the administrative nightmare of spending weeks trying to figure out a way to get 5k to a small unregistered collective in another country. That is our commitment and we make the resources available to make these things happen and encourage other funders to do the same.

Funding the underfunded: While we are good at funding groups with female leadership and feminist values, we still need to step up our efforts to resource more organisations and collectives that are located in rural areas, led by people of colour, members of frontline communities and that are cross-class. Overall, we find that a class analysis has become more important for us in the last year. We increasingly feel the challenge of having a written application form in English and are aware that in many countries this is a serious limitation to resourcing groups not led by members of the ‘professional managerial class’.

Our Activist Council already helped expand our reach and brought in more diverse groups than would have reached out to us and we are committed to finding ways to be more accessible with their help.

In terms of issue areas, we were able to reach more groups working in the field of migration, racial justice and decolonisation (17, up from 10 last year) while the other numbers are almost identical to those of last year. What is invisible behind those labels is the challenge to identify groups that are deeply embedded in their ecosystem, have a truly intersectional analysis and are in solidarity with other struggles beyond lip service. Refining our application process and ability to have conversations with candidates and grantees about these issues is an ongoing process of collective learning and sensemaking. Providing a space where groups can reflect and expand their analysis and ties with other struggles is another way in which we hope to contribute to the field. For example, we went into a conversation with a climate group that we supported after we received feedback from others that their event was not inclusive and did not focus on climate justice as much as we had hoped when funding it. Building intersectional movements is work, takes time and requires the space and openness to be able to challenge narratives about urgency and reflect upon how groups show up in their organising and relating to each other.

Multi-year grants. We’d love to make more of these but our current financial set-up does not allow for it - something we would love to change as we onboard new members into our Funders Circle. However, last year we committed to stop making multi-year commitments to rather established groups in the UK but also move our multi-year support to underfunded geographies where that kind of core support is much more needed. The Common Thing Foundation in Poland and the Right to Housing arm of Re-set in the Czech Republic are the two organisations that received a bit of breathing room through a two year core grant.
BEHIND THE RADICAL FUNDING SCENES

ONE YEAR OF PARTICIPATORY GOVERNANCE

In January 2022, the Guerrilla crew left the comfort and cosiness of a small private foundation to embark on a journey towards a Guerrilla Foundation reloaded. Toni took the lead in inviting others into a Funders Circle (FC) (read his reflections) and the team set off to recruit a kick-ass inaugural Activist Council (AC). While the details are in the blog posts and an overview of our new participatory governance model can be found below, we still want to reflect upon the journey up until now with a couple of lessons learned.

Participation is demanding

To those who think that participatory grantmaking means less work for the team: think again! Setting up the tech and processes for 11 Council members to smoothly give feedback on grant candidates and being involved in filling our grant candidate pipeline, multiple requests and questions from AC and FC as they were figuring out their roles and responsibilities, long emails to report back, coordinate - the team had a lot in its hands this last year! While some of that surely was part of the set-up process, other aspects however, will continue to demand more team time. As the team is moving more from being decision-makers to being coordinators, managing communication flows and facilitating decision-making spaces are skills and areas of work we need to expand into.

Funders Circle

Helps to bring in funds for redistribution, serves as strategic advice & sounding board for staff, space for radphil peer education

Team

Does operations, grantee support & scouting, narrative & storytelling, radphil activities

Activist Council

Decides on grants >10k EUR, scouts grant candidates, gives strategic advice & is a sounding board for team
Challenges of self organisation, meaning & belonging

Both, the AC and FC also had to grow together as groups and generate their own self organising forces. Being activists, the AC were quick to decide for a regular monthly meeting at a fixed time as well as a set of smaller working groups to tackle specific tasks. A coordinator was found to take on communication with the Guerrilla team and all we had to do was offer a couple of open door meetings from our side to discuss any emerging issues before they turned into problems. Also the funders decided for a regular meeting, not as often as the AC and with rotating facilitation as well as more effort spent on finding meeting times and structure. Both groups struggled with the openness of the task of self organising and contributing to conversations within Guerrilla about their role and identity.

Building real belonging to this emerging new organisation (or shall we say organism?) that the Guerrilla Foundation set out to become and creating a collective consciousness as well as a sense of meaning and identity among the sub-groups will take time, conversations and a willingness to grow together as individuals and collectively. This is an experiment after all!

Personal connection building is the essence

What we did realise when coming out of the Guerrilla Kiki - an informal 3 day get-together of five funders, four activists and the Guerrilla team - was that we need more opportunities for building personal connections among everyone involved.

The value of agendaless time spent walking in the forest, chatting by the fire and cooking meals together is impossible to quantify but it’s very present in what we internally now only refer to as ‘the Kiki vibe’.

Inspired by the Kiki and a need for more trust and connection building, both the AC and FC are now planning their own gatherings. I feel there is a sense among many that it might be worth it to spend some time to dig deeper and uncover what’s beneath a superficial commitment to give money and expertise into this experiment. Not that these commitments aren’t substantial but there is a sense in the air that we collectively might unearth a commitment to and vision for a fundamentally different kind of philanthropy. For that to happen we need to know each other and trust more.
Flow funding & transparent compensation are great ideas but hard to practice

Speaking of unbelievable amounts of extra work: never design a flow fund for free distribution by activists if you don’t know how you get that money out in a way that’s in line with charitable requirements! Period. We had the idea for each AC member to redistribute 2500 EUR annually into the European social movement ecosystem in whatever way they felt relevant. What ended up happening is that some of this money has not yet been claimed because it’s unclear how to do this if not as additional personal income that needs to be taxed. Other flow funds have been claimed but were distributed as small grants which requires admin and time on all sides which could have been better used in other ways.

We use Open Collective for transparently compensating Council members and still believe in the benefits of the tool in terms of possibly moving towards a scenario where the Council collectively manages a budget for its work and where everyone is fairly compensated for their contribution. However, setting up a working system and getting people to use the correct invoice templates suitable for their individual circumstance was an administrative nightmare some of us would prefer not to repeat.

Redistribution is messy

Setting up a funder collective with a redistribution focus to resource our work and grow our impact has been a dream for a while. As we are making it happen, we realise more and more that every individual is on their own journey towards radical philanthropy and ultimately redistribution. Some FC members have not ‘come out’ yet as wealthy towards even their closest friends, others want to be anonymous for fear of their family’s safety, others are setting up more traditional family foundations, while also funding more radically through Guerrilla. Others cannot identify (yet?) with a redistribution narrative while wholeheartedly agreeing to other systems change goals we stand for. When we envisioned the Guerrilla Foundation as a vehicle for the so-called ‘high net worth’ folks to redistribute their wealth, these complexities seemed somehow... less complex. The structures and narratives of philanthrocapitalism are powerful and hard to challenge. But we’re on it and we know that there’s a growing field of radical systems change philanthropy out there for whom abolishing philanthrocapitalism is not a crazy thought.

It’s totally worth it!

Even though many things were built on the go and everyone on the team put in extra work and lots of thinking #massiveshoutoutandteamlove, overall the transformation has been a largely rewarding experience. We’re happy to see our grantmaking and pipeline changing towards more grassroots, intersectional, cross-class and minority-led groups and have already funded a couple of incredible organisations we had not been aware of if it wasn’t for the AC’s scouting magic. Having established rapport with our AC members also means that the team now benefits from a quick feedback loop when... it comes to local knowledge and other expertise. For example, a quick email exchange with Maria Francesca from the AC was enough to discover that a Reflex grant candidate had been running as a candidate for a right-wing party in Italy a couple of years before, resulting in a clear no for funding. Having broadened the Guerrilla crew also means that we can step aside and let other voices be heard in spaces that are often inaccessible. In the summer, Joris from the AC joined the PEX Forum in his hometown Istanbul to be our spokesperson on Why philanthropy should fund social movements and build connections with other funders.

We are also grateful for the many inspiring individuals who joined the AC and FC - getting to know them has been such an enriching (and ongoing) experience for me and also other team members.

We keep discovering ways in which we can collaborate and support each other and that there are layers upon layers still to be peeled away to break with separation and silos to learn from and with each other and not fall back into the superficial labels of ‘rich’, ‘activist’, ‘staff’ etc. that do not fully represent any of the individuals we bring together in this experiment.

It’s obvious that we are only beginning to understand what it means to raise this messy, growing infant of a participatory foundation into a responsible, accountable and fun-to-be-around grown up that truly lives the value of participation and makes an important contribution to the ecosystem of European social movements. Do get in touch if you have thoughts, feedback or support to offer us on this journey (romy@guerrillafoundation.org).
Some insights from a conversation between a Guerrilla team member and an Activist Council and a Funders Circle member

Three members of each governance body of the Guerrilla Foundation chatted about the organisation’s governance transition, showcasing some of the inner workings of each new group - the Activist Council and the Funders Circle - and their member’s thoughts on changing the wider charitable-industrial complex that Guerrilla affects into a field where funding grassroots movements is key, embracing the much needed accountability and reparations work that is often lacking in philanthropy.

Heartfelt thanks to both members of the AC and FC for a fruitful and insightful conversation around Guerrilla’s governance transition and your commitment to growing this organisation into a mature participatory model that can inspire change in the field. Due to the interview’s length, we are featuring the full piece in our G Blog, check it out: "In Conversation with an Activist Council and a Funders Circle member".

Teresa: “I must say for us at the GF it was also very important to reflect on our embeddedness in the ecosystem. Growing the organisation into a body that has much more in depth knowledge about the groups we resource really allowed us to better understand the ecosystem we are connected to.”

Binta: “It’s kind of this idea that the people who have direct lived experiences of the systemic inequalities that are impacting them are not the experts of their own experiences. But they are the ones who can put in place solutions. So money is deeply tied to how far you can push your vision and how successful you can be in achieving some of your political outcomes”

Claudia: “Essentially, [we want to become] a group that has a shared understanding about each other and some clear questions that we’re accountable to, being those: how can we influence the philanthropic sector that we’re embedded in to resource more grassroots movements and second, how can we be advocates of the participatory model?”
DEEP DIVE INTO KEY ISSUES

Layered, Systemic, Intersectional Organising

Intersectional feminism is “a prism, for seeing the way in which various forms of inequality often operate together and exacerbate each other”. A systemic approach to taking on interconnected oppressions is working on various pressure points simultaneously, and before pressure is applied, making these interconnections apparent is what movement builders need to do. Solidarity is built when individual groups can step out of their silos and find ways to collaborate with others, even if their work revolves around a single form of oppression. Intersectional movement building centres the expansive, collective vision, while finding functional forms of complementary, strategic action.

Some of our grantees model the theory in practice, the Camera Femina crew, for instance, organise film festivals and cultural events to challenge, entertain and educate audiences with ideas around identity, queerness, gender, feminist principles but do so in a lateral, non-didactic way. The spaces are open to everyone, events are free to overcome financial barriers and there is great care taken to address accessibility, either physical when choosing partner venues but also linguistic (e.g. via translations/sign language provision at events). Similarly Alda, a Basque grassroots group which aims at defending working-class people’s rights, connects a lot of dots in the pursuit of holistic, working class justice. While improving the housing conditions in Basque Country is their long-term goal, one part of the larger vision of this group centers around involving low-income people & neighbourhoods in the wider social and ecological metamorphosis of the society. But when we zoom into the particular activities needed to get there, we find: 1) community-organising groups on housing, 2) free press newspaper to counter dominant media (35,000 copies), 3) awareness raising campaigning on ecological & climate issues 4) tangible bridge building with alternative industries (energy, transport, food, finance). A Balkan sister example comes from the 8th of March Institute in Slovenia, where the initial focus of raising awareness around gender inequality blossomed into a multi-issue grassroots movement for various human rights campaigns. 8th of March first initiated the Slovenian #metoo (#ajtzudi) campaign, which evolved into wider mobilisations around sexual health and reproductive rights within the country, countering the neoconservative tendencies of the current government from a systemic angle. This policy-oriented approach was translated into the Employment Relationships Act Amendment which supports the police officer trade union to protect rebel police officers who resist authoritarian state rule and are being disciplined by the state. The skills needed to mobilise people led the team to sway the political climate in the country overall, resulting in the win of the non-right wing candidate last year. They’re now actively holding the new president accountable who’s not right-wing but also not the left progressive they’d want - currently they are trying to prevent the privatisation of the health system. A little further south in Italy, the Spore Collective have been researching how a Just Transition (socially & ecologically) might be supported with IT tools while connecting individual local struggles to national-level debates around putting these values into political infrastructure. They have been conducting virtual mapping of renewable energy projects while discussing the nuances in climate organising through a social justice lens. Whether it is the No TAP movement, Fridays for Future Italy, anti-extractivist or anti mega off-shore wind farm projects, they dissect the energy sector and expose neocolonial, greenwashed or top-down/undemocratic projects. In parallel they contribute to the ongoing public and bottom-up debate on energy, with commoning solutions and thus a much more comprehensive, intersectional narrative around a wider, Italian Just Transition.

Care & Solidarity, the Bedrock of Sustainable Movements

"Neoliberalism is uncaring by design", writes The Care Collective in The Care Manifesto, a book on the politics of interdependence. "Dependence on care has been pathologised, rather than recognized as part of our human condition", therefore normalising care and bringing care-practices into social movement culture is one step at embracing interdependencies and nurturing one another rather than contributing to collective burn out. Most explicitly, Boiling Point (Wrzenie), a queer-care collective in Poland, have been centering mental health support, burn-out prevention and spreading of tools and practices that protect, safeguard and offer healing resources especially for trans youth and queer people in the countryside. They put together a publication about safe activism, ran a burn-out camp for lgbt+ activists, and organised ad hoc support for displaced Ukrainian queer people arriving in Poland. Care was a topic that emerged in several of our Deeper Inquiry sessions, most notably Embodied Revolution with Skeena Rathor and the Feminisation of Politics with Maria Francesca de Tullio & Irene Zugasti. Investing time and effort into relationships is what leads to resilient, long-term allyship. Skeena’s insights from her work in tending to the vision of Extinction Rebellion, highlights the importance of grief, acknowledging the collective pain body and the vast inequities between global south and north that breed wider social/ecological harms. She says, “we need to organise at the speed of trust”, trust being at the core of building deep, functional relationships - an honest critique behind some of XR’s major shortcomings. In addition, the narrative of feminised politics, a core tenet of radical municipalism, brings many questions around care into how we conduct political organising. Anti-patriarchal practices shape how we run meetings, how parental duties are accommodated in the workplace, and how mental health is conceived politically. This year we also started a novel collaboration with writer and researcher Anthea Lawson who is mapping out patterns and trends in varied European activist scenes with one clear cluster of inquiry being burnout and how to curb it. And not just curb it, but create an entirely different culture, one that doesn’t lead to burnout by default. These discussions have inspired us on our own journey and organisational transformation as we aspire to align our political values and organisational practices through what we call Care-illa. But care takes on many forms and guises. The Care Manifesto continues, “The decimation of public spaces renders a sense of communal life increasingly difficult. There are fewer places for people to congregate, whether for relaxation and enjoyment, or to discuss issues of common concern or participate in collaborative projects. This heightens the competitive individualism that so often leads to loneliness and isolation, while having devastating repercussions for our ability to participate in democratic decision-making". Grantees such as Index, the police accountability lab which uses tech to dig up evidence and support cases of police brutality in France, an off-shoot of Forensic Architecture, is modelling citizen care - peer-to-peer support between citizens when the state fails to protect and serve. Moreover, this type of work supports wider, ecosystemic movement health, the space to dissent, the right to protest, the freedom to oppose injustice. Here work of groups such as Index and Article 11 Trust is absolutely essential. They ensure that laws protect people and allow civil disobedience to continue as an essential part of democratic discourse and worldbuilding. Care emerges as an underlying theme in Defending Dissent with Kevin Blowe, caring for social justice means also caring about the laws and systems that allow us to safeguard it.
Communication Activism

“The revolution will be podcasted”, reads an Upstream sticker, right alongside “You Don’t Hate Mondays, You Hate Capitalism”. Upstream is a podcast that offers a quarterly Documentary series and a bi-monthly In Conversation series exploring a wide variety of themes pertaining to economics - from an anti-capitalist perspective. They have been multi-year grantees and collaborators, releasing accessible in-depth content on layered topics such as The Green Transition or Feminism for the 99% or Workers Cooperatives and have mushroomed from a small DIY project into a media platform with significant reach. Similarly, we have supported more niche audio-content initiatives with a satirical or politically fresh spin. For instance, the People vs Inequality Podcast, spotlights inequality as a root-cause issue behind contemporary social injustice and centres each episode around bridging divides with practical tactics & ideas. Over in Spain, feminist cultural collective, Pandora Mirabilia, together with an informal domestic workers union Territorio Domestico, produced a podcast series specifically designed to appeal to domestic workers (predominantly from Latin America), which they can listen to while doing housework and the podcast centers around the workers knowing their rights, how to get support if an employer refuses to pay or where to seek help if they experience any form of harassment at work. In neighbouring Portugal, Radio Afrolis is a storytelling project about the lived realities of the African diaspora from Lagos to Porto. It explores family dynamics, discrimination, identity development, police/state violence, systemic racism, cultural celebration and grief. The Radio Afrolis podcasts has a specific audience, and the success of the podcast is measured by the people receiving the content who are meant to receive it and use it as a source of empowerment. Mainstreaming is not the goal, rather an uplifting, healing or edifying experience for those who are oppressed and marginalised - who the mainstream misses out on. Similarly in Serbia, the Radar Left Podcast, brought political, feminist satire into a videoblogging format and has been steadily gathering its public. The political discourse is refreshing, new, accessible and familiarises common urban & rural dysfunctions, while being unlike anything screened on tightly-regulated state TV. Similarly, a bit further SouthEast in Romania Forum Apulum uses political media literacy classes and guerrilla field journalism as a way to politically educate Romanian youth and give them the skills and resources so that they may start producing their own stories and political content. And of course, content production is just one realm of comms work, creating the spaces for discourse, dialogue, integration, processing, reflection and sustained learning is how this content is channelled, absorbed or lost. Pembe Hayat KuirFest for instance, is the only queer festival in Turkey that hosts films screening, talks, performances and workshops and it is in these discursive sessions that the public can interact with artists, activists and one another. The need to get more in-depth content but in an interactive space, is what led us to begin the Guerrilla Deeper Inquiry series of videopodcasts both with grantees and other allies in the field. To probe even deeper into notions of radicality and who are the rebels grabbing oppressions by the roots, we started The Radicals, a storytelling initiative reclaiming and reconceptualising radical thinking and action. To paraphrase McLuhan, we become what we behold, we shape our stories and then our stories shape us.
BUILDING COMMUNITY

In 2022, we kept on growing our community ties by doing events with the activist and grantee community that we are accountable to. We did 3 P2P events for our grantee community, meant to dive deep in specific issues relevant to activist modus operandi. To strengthen our grantee network and widen our perspectives while building relationships, we conducted 5 Deeper Inquiry sessions with an overall number of 120 participants and more than 660 online views as of the time of writing.

Leap & CJ working group: Together with Tatiana from our Activist Council, Romy continued her work with the Leap collective. In 2022, Leap hosted one experiment on climate justice (CJ) and developed proposals for other experiments to influence European philanthropy. With funding from the Bosch Foundation, the first active Leap experiment brings together a group of CJ activists across Europe to develop ideas for how the European CJ ecosystem wants to be supported. The experiment will continue in 2023 to put these recommendations into practice and influence more (climate) funders.

Other activist engagements and connections: Teresa and Romy are both part of a municipalist working group in Berlin that is exploring opportunities for creating a city-wide left platform as a civil society-based counterweight to mainstream politics in the city. Besides, Teresa is knee deep in the EMN project, a network that is connecting to different municipalist organisations on the ground while creating alliances that foster networked political action in this field. She’s also active in the Feministisation of Politics working group, which rallies for putting feminist principles into practice in municipalist and activist groups in and outside of the EMN network. In Greece, Ivan is at the heart of an artivist community that is in a constant pulsing rhythm of enquiry & regeneration for spirit, land, and political nourishment. In the city of Athens he is supporting self-organised groups like Communitism to politicise the use of public spaces for commoning, besides being busy with his own queer activism, artistic and experimental projects. Eve, who joined Guerrilla in the summer, is active in defending migration rights for freedom of movement and analysing political violence, especially against people on the move.

Spreading rad phil ideas: We shared our version of radical philanthropy for systems change, our move to participatory grantmaking with HNWIs and other foundations in 1:1 conversations and funder webinars (over 25 hours total). Apart from contributing to changing philanthropy in the long run, these conversations (and countless emails) help make funds available to grassroots groups and movements. It’s hard to track, though, how much money exactly we were able to mobilise because people don’t always report back how much funding flowed as a result of our work and the 50+ introductions we made between funders and activist groups (250k+ of funding were reported back to us though).

Coaching calls: We spent nearly 100 hours on 1:1 check-in and coaching calls with grantees in 2022.
In an effort to be accountable to the ecosystem we support and to our funders, we are transparent about the sources and about how we spend our money. At the same time, we want these pages to be accessible, though, and don’t believe in dumping a whole lot of numbers here that only a small percentage of our target group would be able to understand because they lack specialised financial knowledge. In the end, it’s also rather simple: what do we spend our funding on and where does it come from? This shouldn’t be complicated.

Sources of Funding

The vast majority of our funds comes from the private individuals in our Funders Circle. On top of that we received one additional donation from an anonymous private individual vetted by I.G. Advisors in the UK and one grant from the Swedish Democracy & Pluralism Foundation.

We do not have a capital stock and do not invest money ourselves. Our Funders Circle members disburse their contributions upon request and according to their funding commitment at the beginning of the year. While this allows us to stay nimble as an organisation in terms of financial administration, we do recognise the lack of transparency and control this creates about the sources of that money. Therefore, part of our governance trial period is for the Funders Circle to develop internal guidelines about what kind of money they accept coming into Guerrilla. We encourage FC members to have an internal discussion and hold each other accountable regarding their respective individual commitments when it comes to ‘real spending down for true wealth redistribution’ vs. ‘just’ spending the proceeds of their investments and also about their transparency about their identity being public on our website. At the same time, we acknowledge that each individual has their own personal process and that change takes time.
Spendings

Program costs
The bulk of our outflowing funding is spent on grants (93.52% of total funding). On top of that, we channel money directly to activists through fair compensation of Activist Council members and other individuals who we pay for contributing to our work, e.g. by writing blog posts or providing strategic advice. In total, we redistributed 754,962 EUR or 72.08% of our total budget into the European activist ecosystem.

Team & freelancers
We have a relatively equal pay structure with the highest paid person making only 1.83 times as much after taxes as the lowest paid person. However, it needs to be pointed out that the only full time employee is currently also the highest paid person, our Managing Director. While some people on the (freelance) team chose to work part time to be able to have more time for their activism and other projects, others would like to increase their hours to make more money.

As we are moving towards more self organisation in the future, we expect to have more conversations about the 4-day work week, individual financial needs depending on location and life circumstances, the distribution of labour and responsibility, as well as the ‘valuation’ of different types of expertise and contributions to team and organisational functioning.

A note on ‘overhead’: We spend 22.5% of our annual funding on ‘team and freelancers’ and are regularly being asked whether that is not too much. We don’t believe it is: Our contribution to the ecosystem by making lots of small grants that many other foundations simply are not set up to make. Many times, the time needed for administering a 5k grant to a small activist collective is multiple times that of making a much larger grant to a registered charity. If we received a 10k grant every time we’re being asked to make a small donation to a group that is ‘too small’ for the big funder contacting us, our grant budget could be much higher!
Our communication and other activities to radicalise philanthropy in Europe create ripple effects in the sector - not only in terms of grants that we facilitate to groups in our ecosystem but also in terms of influencing the strategy and grantmaking of other (newly set up) foundations. It’s hard to track and measure these impacts but the feedback we receive on this work tells us to not stop it.

The events, network building and coaching we do to support thinking and connection among actors in the activist ecosystem are similarly important and have contributed to increased connection, coordination and better outcomes of social movement activities.
